

When the FCC was first organized in 1934, a radio license application was granted under the concept of the Public Interest, Convenience or Necessity. Over time, it has become increasingly obvious that this concept is no longer even considered, much less followed.

I fail to see how granting any single applicant access to multiple radio frequencies in a given market, much less in multiple markets across the country will in any way meet the Public's Interest. It obviously isn't a Public Convenience or in any way a Necessity.

Here in Denver we have a flaming example of one company holding multiple licenses. Their stations all spew rock "music" throughout the day. Before continuing this approach to granting radio licenses, it would be interesting to hear from the FCC as to just how this move promotes any Public Interest, Convenience or Necessity. What it promotes is an ongoing travesty.
